Stuffed Green Peppers, Georgia Style.
Beef half a pound of fresh butter to a cream; add six eggs, one by one; beat until very light; then add one quart of fresh cream, the cream of eight soda crackers, one level tablespoonful of salt, one tablespoonful of white pepper, one teaspoonful of cayenne pepper or less, two tablespoonfuls of Worcestershire sauce, two sweet peppers cut into shreds.

Cut the bottom off, around the stem, of one dozen large sweet peppers; take out all seeds and wash; fill with the stuffing; put in a small piece of butter on each, and bake in a moderate oven for twenty minutes, basting frequently with a little ketchup; take out on platter, and pour a spoonful of gravy on each pepper; garnish with parsley; serve very hot.

The "Times" Fashion Hints.

For a cooling down, a woman's hair, resists green at night, made with over skin, and trimmed in heavy point venise lace, chiffon, and velvet ribbons. The tight basque, short on the hips, has a yoke of chiffon gathered very full; point lace outlines the vest of chiffon, and the lace on the sleeves, confining the large yuffs and also forming the tight cuff. A long point of the lace is placed on the over dress—this is made with full plaits in the front with a handsome velvet bow. A dark green velvet collar and a toque with velvet or silk trimming and still elegant, completes a striking dress.

They had parted—well! As people do part who love each other very desperately, knowing that they are horribly wrong in doing so, and realizing that the best thing that could happen to them is that they may never meet again. Dolly had looked ill and miserable for many a month after Talbot left. Then better feelings had been stirred in her when her husband began to see that she was suffering. By the time he died Dolly had forgotten all his treacheries and remembered only his true qualities and remembered only that he had been very good to her. That he had been tolerant to her when she was weak and headstrong about Capt. Talbot and finally that he had left her a wealthy woman, free to do what she pleased with her wealth.

Spilled—A Life.

"Take care of yourself, Dolly, and don't get astray at Dartmoor."

"My dear aunt, when once Tiger goes off he never loses sight of the hounds, so unless the whole pack goes astray I shall be all right."

"Promise me to keep close to your uncle."

"I will if Uncle keeps well in front."

"I feel quite as nervous about you as I used to when you were a girl and you would go off in a hot air."

Dolly laughed and smiled.

"You are always a dreadful responsibility to me, I know, dear Aunt Isabel, but I have always managed to steer clear of evil, both physically and morally," and she ceased speaking, pretty Mrs. Lucy sighed again, as she reflected that it was only by the skin of her teeth at times that she had been saved from bounding on moral rocks.

Her married life had not been, either very stormy or pleasantly calm. Her husband had been a very nice nature and suspicious through circumstances. She started on the sea of matrimony heavily laden with the conviction that Dolly had married him for his money, and Dolly did nothing to lighten him of the load of this humiliating charge.

She was a fascinating little woman, full of pluck and daring, of love and gentleness. Her mother had been a woman and delighted in her as a good comrade, who never uttered them in the field or tussled at them if they smoked in her drawing-room. One man did more than adore and delight in her and that was Arthur Talbot, a captain in the regiment of which Dolly's husband was the colonel.

He betrayed himself to her one day, and after that there was nothing for it but for him to exchange. He had now been in India five years and Dolly had been a widow four and her husband's last words had been, "I shall be back in a fortnight."

She was staying now with her uncle and an old admirer and his wife, and the reason she had volunteered to visit them just now was this. She had seen that four companies of the red rangers, under the command of Maj. Talbot, were to arrive in Plymouth in a troop that was due in her husband's regiment. Tiger and the trooper had arrived and still she had not heard from anything of Maj. Talbot.

They had parted—well! As people do part who love each other very desperately, knowing that they are horribly wrong in doing so, and realizing that the best thing that could happen to them is that they may never meet again. Dolly had looked ill and miserable for many a month after Talbot left. Then better feelings had been stirred in her when her husband began to see that she was suffering. By the time he died Dolly had forgotten all his treacheries and remembered only his true qualities and remembered only that he had been very good to her. CRAIG & HARDING,
13th and F Sts.

We wish to thank the public of Washington for their hearty and generous response to our Fall Opening of yesterday. Our efforts to please were evidently successful to judge from the number of happy faces.

It was simply another proof of the popularity in which The F Street Furniture House is held. But our desire to satisfy will not by any manner of means cease here—as in the past, so in the future, our purpose will always be to make this—has come out of the stirrup again and what a noisy fox. What a time they are finding a fox. I think I have had enough of this kind of sport. I shall go home. You won't mind coming, will you, dear?"

The representative furniture place of Washington.

"I think not. I've not had a run with the Dartmoor hounds for many a long day. You can take Jenkins with you. I shall follow."

"Thanks, as it's my money that pays Jenkins, I suppose I can take him," she said, and she turned to the hounds, following by Jenkins, who was grinning at this interchange of domestic amenities between his master and mistress.

They soon found this fox and went away at racing speed. Dolly, in the excitement of being well up to hounds in a strange country, forgot the elderly likeness to her lover, forgot everything in fact, save that Jenkins was carrying her rippingly. The mist increased, still she could see the ground for a few yards ahead of her. A bit of bright emerald green flashed into view. Tiger rose to it as if it had been a hurdle. Jumped short, and left his hindquarters in one of Dartmoor's most paralyzing poses.

The good little horse struggled gallantly and could have freed himself, but for her weight. She realized this in a moment or two and slipped from her saddle into a whirlpool of mud, that presently touched her down to her waist. Tiger had clambered out, and was galloping wildly backward and forward, flinging his head up and whinnying with his mouth to call attention to the dire distress of the rider, who her always riding in the lead, she loved him, while she was wrestling with the desire of the seething mud to drag her down to the destruction that lies below his bright emerald-green surfaces.

"See that horse galloping by us?" the local informant asked presently of the elderly likeness of Arthur Talbot. "He's ridiculous, by Jove, the woman who was asking me about must be bogged."

He caught at Tiger's rein as the latter swooped by and the little horse after a kick and plunge or two, galloped and hung back in the opposite direction.

"Let the horse lead us," said the man who looked like Arthur Talbot, but older. "For Jenkins's sake make haste, man, or we may be too late."

"Probably we are," the other man said, coolly. "Mrs. Lucy is a well-plucked one. She'll stick and hold on to the last. When she slipped from Tiger she was probably near the flash."

"Mrs. Lucy?"

"Yes, old Dartmoor's niece, didn't I tell you who she was? Pretty widow, rich and free as air, and as sweet as the freshest air that blows. She was awfully sweet on a chap in her husband's regiment some years ago. No wonder, you know, but every one knew she was sweet on him. He exchanged and the husband died soon after, but no one has a chance with her, I told you; she's waiting for the old love to turn up again."

"Let Tiger go, he'll lead us to her, he's truer to her than any other man—or beast—has been," the stranger growled out, and he turned to the hounds, who were still in the place where he had left his mistress.

She was up to her shoulders now, half dead with the pressure, and more than half delirious with terror. But in a moment he recognized the sweet, panic-stricken face and the tiny hands that were beating the air in such a futile, frantic fashion.

"Dolly!" he cried. He was off his horse, holding out his arms to her. He was her own true lover after all. He was saving her from such a fearful death.

She felt herself drawn out from the embrace of the grasping mud. It had needed a little effort to free her, but she had been incapable of making that little effort, and so now it was doubly delightful to find that he, her own Arthur of old days, was making it for her. Saturated with mud as she was, she flung her arms round his neck, as her feet reached firm ground, and with a little whimper of intense happiness she sobbed out:

"Only one darling, Arthur, I'm so cramped; do hold me tight. I thought you were by me just now when you came to the meet, but I was puzzled by the ugly woman with the bony forehead, who called you 'dear.' Do hold me up to your heart and let me get away somewhere to dry me. This bog bath has given me a chill, but I'd like this minute to be pulled out of it by you."

She had rattled on hurriedly, hardly looking at him as she spoke, only clasping his hand closer and closer in her own. God be thanked there was no occasion why she should be ashamed to him and show the love she felt for him now.

"I wish I could find a farmhouse or cottage to put you in to be dried," he said nervously. "I'm awfully glad I happened to be here to-day, you might have had an awkward time of it if I
